The French Market for Musical Instruments during Vuillaume's time: First Steps

Florence Gétreau

To try and understand the French market for musical instruments of the nineteenth century remains a delicate task. The sources are essentially the printed catalogues of public sales and the largely unpublished manuscript archives of instrument makers¹.

We have thus undertaken a systematic inventory of the public sales catalogues of a few large collections, without this review being exhaustive. The Bibliothèque Nationale de France (département des Imprimés, département des Estampes et de la Photographie, département de la Musique), the Bibliothèque d'Art et d'Archéologie (Fondation Jacques Doucet), as well as the library of the Musée instrumental du Conservatoire de Bruxelles², have enabled us to widen our search of the number of sales mentioned respectively in the publication by Frits Lugt³, and in the more specialised study by James Coover⁴. The latter has inventoried about twenty collections dispersed in Paris during the nineteenth century involving quartet instruments, as well as about ten sales of old instruments without quartet instruments. At this stage of our work (for we would need to go through the archives of the Compagnie des Commissaires Priseurs de Paris), we can already rely on a body of work that is fairly representative: on the one hand seventy-four public sales, devoted almost entirely to violins, violas, cellos or double basses; and on the other hand about thirty sales devoted partially or totally to old instruments or curiosities, with no quartet instruments.

These results, even if provisional, show the double orientation of nineteenth century instrument collections. On the one hand musicians, amateurs or professionals, and professional instrument makers bring together the elements of contemporary musical practice. They are interested above all in the instruments which make up string quartets, even if sometimes their curiosity widens the field of their collection. On the other hand, painters⁵ (Revoil, Voillemot, Flameng), amateurs of beautiful objects (Alexandre Sauvageot⁶, E. Laborie, Lericet Duflos, Charles Davillier, Julien Fau, Madame Nathaniel de Rothschild), instrument makers (Adolphe Sax, Mme Erard, Gustave Lyon, Chartier, A. Thibout), musicologists (Charles de Coussemaker), composers and musicians (Louis Clapisson, Eugène de Bricqueville), collected instruments passed from use, often of a very rare design, but are not interested in the instruments of the string quartet range. This second group of collectors seems to have come into existence during the second decade of the century, the first collections having been dispersed from 1840. It is only at the end of the 1880s that collectors started trying to restore these instruments, created for forgotten repertoires, to playing condition⁷. But, in this research, we are only interested in the first group of collections, those which include quartet instrument making.

The second source which we intend to exploit for this study is made up of the accounting archives of instrument makers. They show the day-to-day trade and taste of the musicians. The Musée de la Musique has the good fortune to possess an exceptional collection of documents from Gand, Gand & Bernardel frères, Bernardel, Caressa & Français. The systematic exploitation of these documents would enable us to amplify the preliminary results presented hereafter, and to formulate realistic statistics, which we feel are still premature. Juxtaposing the two types of sources will confirm the tendencies expressed by public sales, while providing additional information.

Typology of public sales including quartet instruments

A first analysis of the corpus of public sales presented here⁶ enables us to define three main categories of collections: the great majority of these sales (48 out of 74) concern lots which include paintings, furniture, decorative objects, coaches, harnessing, arms, clocks, wine, etc., as well as musical instruments, whose number and quality can be quite remarkable. The sales of the composer Gioacchino Rossini (1869), and in particular those of the violinists Joseph Telesinki (1876) (he had a Bergonzi violin), and Jules Armengaud (1900) (owner of a Guarnerius del Gesù violin), are typical examples of these mixed sales where Italian instruments of top quality can be found.

From the 1860s appeared sales entirely devoted to quartet instruments. We have checked twenty of them. They are sometimes diversified, sometimes limited, but always include one or two top quality pieces, which justify a specialised sale. The first sale to illustrate this second category is that of Jean-Joseph Vidal, first violin at the Chapelle de Charles X et de Louis Philippe (1868); followed by that of Fibich, former violinist at the Chapelle de S.M. l'Empereur d'Autriche, and solo violin at the Strasbourg and Metz concert houses. In this category we can also mention Achille Gouffé, the famous double bass player for whom two sales were organised (1875 and 1892). It is noticeable that in the collections of these professional musicians, the number of instruments is greater than the quality. On the other hand, the collections of the violinist Joseph Mas (1898), soloist at the Société des Concerts du Conservatoire, or professors of music such as

1. Bill of sale of Jean-Baptiste Vuillaume for a J.-P. Thibout violin made for Arthur Saint-Léon (musée de la Musique, E 471), 30 December 1872. Paris, Archives nationales, AJ37 387.

Bouchet (1891) and Trombetta (1899), and of rich amateurs (Mr. Durand-Dubois, S. Glandaz, count Théodore Torcy, M. d'Emonville, the viscountess of La Panouse, Abel Bonjour), include current instruments of top quality. In a different category, two specialised sales devoted to the contents of instrument makers' workshops are worth noting: that of Jean-Baptiste Vuillaume in 1880, which we will come back to, and that of Claude-Augustin Miremont in 1888.

From 1880 onward, a third category of public sales appears: those, not very numerous, where quartet instruments are on sale among very complete lots of ancient instruments. In this case, the expert on historic instrument making is also an amateur musician, but the instruments he uses for practicing do not include any major violins. In 1881 Luigi Arrigoni, a Milanese organologist recently established in Paris, offered 173 instruments, of which 23 are Italian violins with doubtful attributions. The following year, the cellist Léon Savoye sold his first collection, 214 instruments of all kinds. Together with harpsichords, violas da gamba and plucked string instruments of various periods, is a Klotz viola, a Chanot guitar-shaped viola and eight unspectacular French violins. In 1833 the collection put together by the piano manufacturers Mangeot Frères & Co. was sold. Among a majority of keyboard or plucked string instruments, it included eight violins of which five have Italian attributions that cannot be proved. Soon after, Georges Samary, violinist at the Théâtre Italien, sold about 170 old instruments, including 20 violins: one by Giovanni Paolo Maggini, two, unvarnished, from the Vuillaume sale. Among seven cellos, two are by Vuillaume. Similarly, Ernest Loup, a regular at Drouot sales from 1877, tastefully put together a collection of about 300 instruments of all periods and families during a ten-year period. His nine violins were all of second rank, among them some Vieux Paris, an Italian (Pressenda in Turin) and a Vuillaume. Finally we have included within this tendency the Ernest Gand sale (1904) which definitely closes this overview of the nineteenth century. Put together by the last representative of this dynasty, the sale consisted of 137 instruments including some specimens by Nicolas Lupot⁹, François Lupot, Gand père¹⁰, Gand of Versailles¹¹, Gand frères. But it is also completed by violas da gamba, kits, citterns and theorbos, instruments from amateur cabinets and by reconstitutions, many elements that render it similar to the sets collected by Savoye, Samary and Loup.

Authentification of instruments described in catalogues

The identification of instruments on offer remains often uncertain. There are no descriptions in these catalogues, no photographs¹², no measurements, no record of labels or marks. In some cases the names of the makers have been roughly altered. It should be noted that no expert instrument maker was called on by the auctioneers until the intervention in 1872 of Gand & Bernardel frères. As from the Durand-Dubois senior sale, it can be said that this workshop provided the great majority of appraisals carried out for sales including musical instruments, specialised or not¹³. A much more precise and systematic terminology is then noticeable to describe the degrees of authenticity of the violins: "violin by", "violin in the style of", "stamped violin", "violin in imitation of". The sales carried out without the intervention of this prestigious workshop confirm the impression of great approximation left by other non-specialised experts¹⁴.

To complete this information, the auction of items remains very precious because, if they do not represent an absolute guarantee, they nevertheless reflect a scale of value, degrees of beauty or rarity of the pieces on offer, a reflection in any case of evolving taste. If, for the moment, the in-depth examination of auctioneers' archives remains a dream¹⁵, some annotated sales catalogues can be useful in this first approach. Those used by the curators of the Musée instrumental du Conservatoire de Paris are very precious in this regard. There are also about thirty catalogues from Gand & Bernardel kept in the Musée Instrumental de Bruxelles, almost all of them annotated by the evaluators themselves. This information, compared with the accounting archives of this same firm preserved at the Musée de la Musique, provides further elements of analysis which enable a first approach to be made of the musical instrument market during the nineteenth century in Paris.

Presence of Italian Instruments

Over half a century, from 1845 to 1903, 22 violins by Antonio Stradivari were catalogued as such in the sales examined here. For two thirds of these instruments, we possess auction prices ranging from 1,040 francs (1872, Ramonet sale) to 22,100 for the "La Pucelle" violin at the Glandaz sale in 1878. But values are varied considerably since the violin dated 1714 "ex-Cuisinier" reached 7,900 francs at the Maulaz sale in 1875, whereas at the same sale another instrument, dated 1717 this time, went for 2,200 francs. In 1878 at the anonymous sales of 18 April and 23 November, one of them reached 5,000 francs, the other 3,250. The Emonville sale offered two examples of the same period (1713 and 1714) at similar prices (respectively 4,650 and 4,600), and the following year the violin of Madame de La Panouse went for 14,500 francs. After the Degarge sale in 1885 (a violin of 1716 was sold for 7,050 francs), Cail in 1890 (1719 violin acquired by Samary for 5,200 francs) and Trombetta (a Stradivari-son of 1736 reached 5,850), exceptional prices would not be found until 1903 with the Lelong sale (1720 violin for 12,000 francs, and 1725 for 19,900 francs). To appreciate these fluctuations, the regular trade of the Gand workshop should be examined. Between 1843 and 1852, nine transactions concern the Cremona master for much more reasonable and regular amounts, going from 1,700 to 3,700 francs. A violin, for example, was sold to the famous dancer and violinist Arthur Saint-Léon in February 1844 for 2,600 francs (See 1), an average price during this decade¹⁶. One can in fact compare these amounts with those indicated by Hill in their publication on Antonio Stradivari¹⁷: Viotti's violin was sold for 3,816 francs at the auction room in 1824; Habeneck bought one of the master's violins from Lupot for 2,400 francs in the same year; "le Messie" was offered to Julien Fau in 1865 by Vuillaume for 10,000 francs; finally the four quartet instruments signed by the master and belonging to Mr. de St. Senoch were dispersed at his death for the following amounts: a violin (1737) for 15,000 francs, a second violin dated 1704 for 7,000, a viola of 1728 for 12,900, a cello for 10,200 francs. In order to have an idea of the value of these prices it was interesting to note that Vuillaume himself sold a Thibout violin "made for Saint Léon" to the Musée Instrumental for 200 francs in 1872 (See 2.).

Carlo Bergonzi's instruments, although not numerous, reached high sums when compared with those of his master. Three violins offered respectively in the Maulaz sale (1,550 francs), Telezinki (2,120) and Emonville (3,050, bought by Gand & Bernardel), whereas the violins sold by this workshop between 1843 and 1850 reached a maximum of 500 francs. Violins by Joseph Guarnerius appeared more often, and were negotiated between 700¹⁸ and 28,000 francs¹⁹, but a specimen from 1733 was sold for 2,020 francs at the Emonville sale in 1881.

The name of Duiffopruggar appears very rarely: once in 1845 and then in an anonymous sale of 1857 ("very good violin", sold for 1,520 francs); finally in the Maulaz sale, an instrument attributed to him was bought for 1,010 francs. Amati instruments are regularly mentioned in the Gand registers, but it was almost impossible to tell which member of the dynasty was being designated. Their instruments go for between 400 and 1,000 francs. As for public sales, a violin "with coat of arms on the back" reaches 4,630 francs at the Maulaz sale (1875), whereas a violin with no indication of Christian name, dated 1636, was sold for 2,100 francs to Itel (See 3) during the Cail sale in April 1890.

Giovanni Paolo Maggini was represented seven times in sales between 1842 and 1887, with the best price at 2,150 francs in April 1878, Mr. Croué buying a violin from Gand in 1847 for 1,000 francs. Francesco Ruggeri's prices do not go over 700 francs in 1849, also from Gand, and do not reach more than 1,000 to 1,500 in important sales of the second half of the century (1,150 at the Emonville sale; 1,500 at the Cail sale bought by Hill). The Guadagnini family, with no indication of Christian name, appears frequently in the Gand registers, with instruments on sale between 300 and 500 francs in mid-century.

The Vuillaume Sale

The Italian school was the only one to attract so many talented musicians (Jacob Stainer was sold for barely more than a new Parisian violin around 1843, whereas the Klotz family appears only five times in public sales). In these circumstances how could one not be disappointed by the contents of the sale following Jean-Baptiste Vuillaume's death, organised with the help of Gand & Bernardel at Drouot on 21 and 22 May 1880 (See 4). Have we not shown in the present exhibition's catalogue the important role played by this instrument maker in the circulation and diffusion of Italian instruments? The list of instruments printed for this sale was entitled "Catalogue composant sa collection de violons, violoncelles, contrebasses et instruments anciens"²⁰. But there are only two instruments with plucked strings given as authentic creations of Antonio Stradivari: a cittern dated 1700 and a guitar dated 1711. The cittern was in fact considered, from 1937, to be a work by Gerolamo di Virchis (Brescia, end of sixteenth century), probably modernised by Stradivari. It was bought for the considerable sum of 6,600 francs in 1889 by the Musée Instrumental de Paris from Henri Croué, Delphin Alard's son-in-law. It was Alard, Vuillaume's son-in-law, who lent this exceptional piece to two retrospective exhibitions

(in 1878 at the Trocadero in Paris, in 1885 in London)²¹. The second instrument was a guitar whose attribution, sometimes called into question, was today confirmed and it was placed among the master's production of plucked string instruments²². The "six moulds of different models from the workshop of Stradivarius" appearing later on in this sale are of great organological importance. They correspond to several preserved instruments by the master, and complete the precious technical documentation kept at the Cremona Museo Civico²³. They were acquired by the Paris museum together with the guitar, a collection of accessories and a viola d'amore by Storioni. With two violins (one marked Stradivari, the other "Gasparo da Salo"), a Testore, two violas and a cello, this lot was a timid witness of the intense negotiating activity Vuillaume kept up with Italy. Besides a few French violins and violas (François Lupot, Bassot, Rémy, Augustin Claudot, Bernardel père, Bourlier, Nicolas Vuillaume), this sale was the occasion to disperse the remnants of the famous instrument maker's workshop. A violin with his mark, an imitation of "le Messie", two cellos, copies of Stradivari, a small Sainte-Cécile double bass, preceded thirty unvarnished violins, Stradivari models, eight Giuseppe Guarnerius models; six others were just tinted. Also three unvarnished violas, five cellos and numerous bows from his workshop (some models with a fixed frog or a steel stick), together with some guitars. Planed wood, spare pieces, cases, wood cut out for violins (175 bellies, as many backs) and cellos (35 bellies, 20 backs), and sticks (1,450), give an idea of this prestigious workshop's activity. No auction price was reported by Chouquet for the copy from the catalogue of the Musée Instrumental. However one can get an idea of the prices reached by pieces from Vuillaume's workshop during the end of the nineteenth century: a cello with his mark, dated 1872, was sold to the Musée Instrumental de Paris by Gand & Bernardel three months after the sale (number 29 or 30) for 800 francs. The Conservatory's suppliers probably forced the price up a little compared to the auction. At the Emonville sale in 1881, a Vuillaume cello, an imitation of a Stradivari, reached only 335 francs and a Sainte Cécile amateur double bass, 159 francs. At the Miremont sale in 1888, a violin, imitation of Stradivari, found a taker at only 135 francs. In 1896 (François sale), a cello cost 195 francs, and a viola varnished by Chanot 385 at the Trombetta sale in 1899²⁴. Vuillaume seems to have entered a sort of purgatory compared to Lupot of whom a bass was sold for 1,550 francs at the Maulaz sale in 1875.

13. Of the 51 sales organised from 1872 to 1904 at Drouot Auction Room, only 17 did not ask for the expertise of, successively, Gand and Bernadel, then from 1892 Bernadel, and finally in 1903 Caressa and Français. Chardon & Son (in 1899 for the Trombetta sale) and H. C. Silvestre (in 1900 for the Armingaud sale) are the only other instrument makers requested by the auctioneers.
14. Paul Eudel was surprised at the mediocrity of the instruments on sale without expertise at the Liugi Arrigoni sale in 1881. The expert was Gaudouin. Cf. Eudel, Paul, L'Hôtel Drouot et la curiosité, Paris, Charpentier, 1882, t. II, p. 5-6, and Truc et Truqueurs, Paris, Molière Bookshop, 1907, p. 293.
