

HAL
open science

Hating men will free you? Valerie Solanas in Paris or the discursive politics of misandry

Léa Védie

► To cite this version:

Léa Védie. Hating men will free you? Valerie Solanas in Paris or the discursive politics of misandry. European Journal of Women's Studies, 2021, 28 (3), pp.305-319. 10.1177/13505068211028896 . halshs-03328472

HAL Id: halshs-03328472

<https://shs.hal.science/halshs-03328472>

Submitted on 21 Feb 2022

HAL is a multi-disciplinary open access archive for the deposit and dissemination of scientific research documents, whether they are published or not. The documents may come from teaching and research institutions in France or abroad, or from public or private research centers.

L'archive ouverte pluridisciplinaire HAL, est destinée au dépôt et à la diffusion de documents scientifiques de niveau recherche, publiés ou non, émanant des établissements d'enseignement et de recherche français ou étrangers, des laboratoires publics ou privés.

European Journal of Women's Studies

Hating men will free you? Valerie Solanas in Paris or the discursive politics of misandry

Journal:	European Journal of Womens Studies
Manuscript ID	EJW-20-0088.R1
Manuscript Type:	Original Article
Keywords:	Misandry, Feminist Theory, Mouvement de Libération des Femmes, Respectability politics, Valerie Solanas, Hatred
Abstract:	In the wake of contemporary controversies in France over feminist misandry (Coffin 2020, Harmange 2020), this article reflects on claimed hatred of men as a feminist discursive resource. I use the reception of Valerie Solanas' SCUM Manifesto by some radical French feminists of the 1970s as a privileged case study, along with historian Colette Picon's study on misandry within French second wave feminist movements and Judith Butler's works on stigma reversal. I contend that in a seemingly paradoxical way misandry is both an anti-feminist stigma and a feminist discursive strategy: the inhibiting effects of such injurious term on feminist politics – the aggressive, castrating and hateful feminist you should at all cost avoid to become – can be managed, if not neutralized, by means of feminist misandry. From that point, I argue that claimed hatred of men can open fruitful political venues in challenging the stifling effects of respectability politics.

SCHOLARONE™
Manuscripts

Hating men will free you? Valerie Solanas in Paris or the discursive politics of misandry

Introduction

In September 2020, a small independent French publishing house issued a manifesto straightforwardly entitled I Hate Men (Moi, les hommes, je les déteste), written by Pauline Harmange, a young feminist blogger and activist (Harmange, 2020). Ralph Zuméry, an employee of the French Ministry of Gender Equality, approached the publishing house on his own initiative, charged the book with hate speech and urged the publisher to take it off the market (Cappelle, 2021). This attempt immediately set the 'Streisand effect' in motion: within a few weeks, the initially confidential manifesto was acquired by a major publishing house, reprinted in large volumes and translated into several languages.<sup>1</sup> Soon thereafter, journalist, ecologist and Paris city councillor Alice Coffin published an essay – Lesbian Genius – which she says she seriously considered titling 'misandre' (man-hater) (Coffin, 2020: p. 10), and in which she unapologetically claims her distrust of men. These two cases share more than one commonality. Both authors claim misandry as integral part of their feminism, and, paradoxically, their statements were largely popularized by the vehemence of their anti-feminist opponents' attacks. They brought the issue of hatred of men to the forefront, inspiring an outrage that highlighted the close and complex intertwining of feminist misandry and reactionary discourses.

What does it mean when feminists claim misandry? How can we analyse violent feelings when directed by an oppressed group (women) against a structurally dominant group (men)? I approach this issue by looking at a historical and archetypal case, the reception of Valerie Solana's SCUM Manifesto in France. In doing so, I aim at filling a gap in feminist studies: while emotions are a privileged field of inquiry, hate has been given little attention and its role in feminist movements is relatively unexplored. The few works on the issue tend to emphasize its reactionary dimension by focusing on hatred of minorities, be they racial, sexual, gender, etc. The contrast is striking, as similar feelings such as anger have received a lot of coverage (Holmes, 2004; Lorde, 1984b; Spelman, 1996; Ahmed, 2013). In spite of many feminists' legitimate reluctance to investigate such an 'ugly feeling' (Ngai, 2005), I argue that claimed hatred against men is worth studying. With hatred, I aim to bring an original perspective to feminist affect studies, drawing inspiration from the already well-documented negative turn in queer studies that has occurred in the last two decades (Halberstam, 2011).

This article aims at clarifying the possibilities, limits and implications of the uses of hatred as a discursive resource by feminists. My discussion, although ultimately theoretical, is based on an empirical inquiry into the reception of Valerie Solanas' SCUM Manifesto within the French feminist movements of the 1970s. As a feminist theorist, I aim at taking the case of Solanas' reception in France as a privileged case study for an investigation on the signification of hatred in feminist discourses, and to assess the role of feminist misandry for feminism from a normative perspective. To that end, I use press articles of the 1970s from French feminist journals and works of historians. What are the effects of Solanas' speeches about hating men on feminist movements? What possibilities can such a discourse offer to feminism and which ones does it foreclose?

<sup>1</sup> The English translation by Natasha Lehrer was released in November 2020. See Harmange and Lehrer (2020).

1
2 I will first examine the reasons for feminists' reluctance to talk about their negative feelings about
3 men and show that misandry is first and foremost an anti-feminist stigma feminists have to contend
4 with. Then, I will raise the issue of feminist anti-men hate discourses – how should we understand
5 and interpret the discourses of feminists like Harmange or Coffin who actually claim to hate men?
6 Drawing from Judith Butler's work on stigma reversal I will show that such speeches can be read as 7 discursive strategies. I will then further this hypothesis discussing the work of historian Colette
8 Pipon on misandry in the French feminist movements in the 1970s, paying special attention to the 9 reception of Solanas' SCUM Manifesto. Finally, I argue that, as a contextual discursive strategy, 10 man-hating discourses can open fruitful political venues in challenging the stifling effects of 11 respectability politics, which may explain their enduring appeal among contemporary feminists.
12
13
14
15
16
17

18 I. Thinking what feminists do not want to think: toward a negative turn in feminist affect 19 studies

20 Feminists have been reluctant to explore the links between feminism and hatred. This reluctance 21 may first be linked to the problematic role hatred is usually associated with in politics, namely the 22 many forms of hatred towards minorities – racial hatred, anti-Semitism, homophobia, misogyny,
23 etc.; what I will call here reactionary hatred. Audre Lorde thus assesses that contrary to anger,
24 hatred is fundamentally a destructive feeling directed by oppressors towards those they oppress; a 25 'virulent' affect against 'women, people of Color, lesbians and gay men, poor people' (Lorde, 26 1984b: p. 128). As a progressive movement, feminism seems at odds – or feminists may like to 27 think it at odds – with such hate expressed against oppressed groups.
28
29
30

31 Moreover, hatred appears highly essentializing. It consists in a desire to harm others that, contrary
32 to anger, does not focus on specific acts or interactions but rather on the individual or group as a
33 whole. Sarah Ahmed describes the way hatred results in turning the mere existence of marginalized
34 racialized bodies into an injury to the 'ordinary white subject'. Hatred, she argues, is part of a social 35 narrative that 'works by generating a subject that is endangered' and threatened by the sole
36 'proximity' of 'imagined others' (Ahmed, 2013: pp. 42–43). Hatred then takes on an ontological
37 dimension – it is directed towards someone's whole being rather than their deeds. In his 38 philosophical work on the role of hatred in politics, Oliver Le Cour Grandmaison assesses that as a 39 consequence, from a political perspective 'hate can never be good' (2002: p. 1): 'it can transform 40 conflicts which in any society are simple, ordinary and unavoidable into major confrontations 41 whereby the annihilation of hated others becomes a necessary and inescapable goal' (p. 60).
42
43
44
45

46 What are the similarities and differences between reactionary hatred, instrumental in oppressing
47 minorities and maintaining social hierarchies, and an affect such as misandry? Misandry, or the 48 hatred of men, is targeted against a group that is placed in a (relative) position of power and 49 privilege. As such, it is significantly different from the emotions described by Ahmed and Lorde.
50 Reversed hatred (or hatred against a dominant group), unlike reactionary hatred, is more likely to 51 challenge the existing economy of power and vulnerability than to reinforce it. However, even when 52 directed against dominant groups rather than marginalized people, hatred has tended to raise 53 suspicion among feminists.
54
55
56

57 First, feminist activists are confronted with constant allegations of misandry from their opponents:
58 there is a continued and strong anti-feminist stereotype of feminists as man-haters, wherever 59
60

1
2 feminist movements have been historically present.<sup>2</sup> In France, instances of this stereotype have
3 recently emerged in the wake of the French #metoo movement – #BalanceTonPorc
4 (#ExposeYourPig). In January 2018, Le Monde published an article signed by 100 prominent
5 women (including famous French actress Catherine Deneuve) advocating for a ‘freedom to pester
6 (women)’ (liberté d’importuner): ‘As women’, they wrote, ‘we do not recognize ourselves in this 7 feminism which goes beyond denouncing abuses of power to turn into a hatred of men and 8 sexuality’<sup>3</sup> (Collectif, 2018). Other social actors use the ‘feminists hate men’ rhetoric for an even 9 much more explicit anti-feminist purpose. On the occasion of March 8th 2020, Valeurs Actuelles,
10 an unabashedly and virulently far-right French magazine, drew a portrait of six prominent activists 11 (depicted as ‘the new feminist hags’) – two of them criticized for their ‘hatred of men’ and their 12 ‘man-hating speeches’ (Clément et al., 2020). Finally, ‘misandry’ has been one of the favoured
13 arguments of masculinist movements since the second wave. The word is used in order to describe
14 men as victims of a tyrannical project aimed at establishing a society in which women dominate 15 men, sometimes associated with ‘aggressive lesbianism’ (Dupuis-Déri, 2012; Dupuis-Déri and 16 Blais, 2015, p. 102). These uses of hate as an argument to discredit and raise hostility against 17 feminism are not new. ‘The stereotype has hardly been renewed since the end of the 19th century’, 18 stresses historian Christine Bard, and since the suffragist movements, feminists have been 19 repeatedly accused of hating men (based on their supposed lesbianism) and despising them in their 20 advocacy for ‘female superiority’ (Bard, 1999: pp. 305–308). She emphasizes the persistence of the 21 stereotype of feminists as man-haters, which periodically resurfaces as an element of anti-feminist
22 backlash rhetoric. No wonder feminists reject misandry, thereby refusing an antifeminist discourse 23 intended to bait them into a degrading stereotype.

24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32 Second, many feminist theorists have successfully argued that the ontological consequences of 33 hatred can prove hard, if not impossible, to erase. This dimension seems to be incompatible with 34 feminism as a political and theoretical project of de-essentializing social identities and interactions.
35 Many post-structuralist feminists emphasize that defining men as an essential enemy has the 36 consequence of grounding feminism on an idealized community of women – a representation that 37 tends to reinforce gender normativity and to obscure the ways some women can themselves embody 38 and/or side with the oppressors. First, feminist misandry is often incorporated into arguments that 39 tend to enforce gender categories as binary, rigid and normalizing devices.<sup>4</sup> As such, many 40 feminists have regarded hatred of men as contrary to their emancipatory agenda (Elam, 1994: pp.
41 106–108; Hekman, 2000: p. 295). Second, feminist misandry regularly comes with the prioritization 42 of anti-sexist struggle over other types of emancipatory movements, sexism being defined as the 43 most fundamental oppression, thus minimizing the effects of other power relations. bell hooks, for 44 example, criticizes bourgeois white women’s assertions that ‘men are the enemy’, a claim that 45 merely ‘[deflects] attention away from their support of continued exploitation and oppression’
46 (hooks, 1984: pp. 68–69). From a deconstructivist perspective that aims to criticize the essentialist 47 presuppositions of feminist thought, hatred of men thus appears as a feeling that inevitably leads to 48 political dead-ends.

56
57
58
59
60
61
62
63
64
65
66
67
68
69
70
71
72
73
74
75
76
77
78
79
80
81
82
83
84
85
86
87
88
89
90
91
92
93
94
95
96
97
98
99
100
101
102
103
104
105
106
107
108
109
110
111
112
113
114
115
116
117
118
119
120
121
122
123
124
125
126
127
128
129
130
131
132
133
134
135
136
137
138
139
140
141
142
143
144
145
146
147
148
149
150
151
152
153
154
155
156
157
158
159
160
161
162
163
164
165
166
167
168
169
170
171
172
173
174
175
176
177
178
179
180
181
182
183
184
185
186
187
188
189
190
191
192
193
194
195
196
197
198
199
200
201
202
203
204
205
206
207
208
209
210
211
212
213
214
215
216
217
218
219
220
221
222
223
224
225
226
227
228
229
230
231
232
233
234
235
236
237
238
239
240
241
242
243
244
245
246
247
248
249
250
251
252
253
254
255
256
257
258
259
260
261
262
263
264
265
266
267
268
269
270
271
272
273
274
275
276
277
278
279
280
281
282
283
284
285
286
287
288
289
290
291
292
293
294
295
296
297
298
299
300
301
302
303
304
305
306
307
308
309
310
311
312
313
314
315
316
317
318
319
320
321
322
323
324
325
326
327
328
329
330
331
332
333
334
335
336
337
338
339
340
341
342
343
344
345
346
347
348
349
350
351
352
353
354
355
356
357
358
359
360
361
362
363
364
365
366
367
368
369
370
371
372
373
374
375
376
377
378
379
380
381
382
383
384
385
386
387
388
389
390
391
392
393
394
395
396
397
398
399
400
401
402
403
404
405
406
407
408
409
410
411
412
413
414
415
416
417
418
419
420
421
422
423
424
425
426
427
428
429
430
431
432
433
434
435
436
437
438
439
440
441
442
443
444
445
446
447
448
449
450
451
452
453
454
455
456
457
458
459
460
461
462
463
464
465
466
467
468
469
470
471
472
473
474
475
476
477
478
479
480
481
482
483
484
485
486
487
488
489
490
491
492
493
494
495
496
497
498
499
500
501
502
503
504
505
506
507
508
509
510
511
512
513
514
515
516
517
518
519
520
521
522
523
524
525
526
527
528
529
530
531
532
533
534
535
536
537
538
539
540
541
542
543
544
545
546
547
548
549
550
551
552
553
554
555
556
557
558
559
560
561
562
563
564
565
566
567
568
569
570
571
572
573
574
575
576
577
578
579
580
581
582
583
584
585
586
587
588
589
590
591
592
593
594
595
596
597
598
599
600
601
602
603
604
605
606
607
608
609
610
611
612
613
614
615
616
617
618
619
620
621
622
623
624
625
626
627
628
629
630
631
632
633
634
635
636
637
638
639
640
641
642
643
644
645
646
647
648
649
650
651
652
653
654
655
656
657
658
659
660
661
662
663
664
665
666
667
668
669
670
671
672
673
674
675
676
677
678
679
680
681
682
683
684
685
686
687
688
689
690
691
692
693
694
695
696
697
698
699
700
701
702
703
704
705
706
707
708
709
710
711
712
713
714
715
716
717
718
719
720
721
722
723
724
725
726
727
728
729
730
731
732
733 734
735
736
737
738
739
740
741
742
743
744
745
746
747
748
749
750
751
752
753
754
755
756
757
758
759
760
761
762
763
764
765
766
767
768
769
770
771
772
773
774
775
776
777
778
779
780
781
782
783
784
785
786
787
788
789
790
791
792
793
794
795
796
797
798
799
800
801
802
803
804
805
806
807
808
809
810
811
812
813
814
815
816
817
818
819
820
821
822
823
824
825
826
827
828
829
830
831
832
833
834
835
836
837
838
839
840
841
842
843
844
845
846
847
848
849
850
851
852
853
854
855
856
857
858
859
860
861
862
863
864
865
866
867
868
869
870
871
872
873
874
875
876
877
878
879
880
881
882
883
884
885
886
887
888
889
890
891
892
893
894
895
896
897
898
899
900
901
902
903
904
905
906
907
908
909
910
911
912
913
914
915
916
917
918
919
920
921
922
923
924
925
926
927
928
929
930
931
932
933
934
935
936
937
938
939
940
941
942
943
944
945
946
947
948
949
950
951
952
953
954
955
956
957
958
959
960
961
962
963
964
965
966
967
968
969
970
971
972
973
974
975
976
977
978
979
980
981
982
983
984
985
986
987
988
989
990
991
992
993
994
995
996
997
998
999
1000

3 All the original translations in this article are mine.

4 Such uses can be found in cases of naturalizing descriptions of sexual difference within second-wave radical feminism in the United States: for instance, feminist activist Jill Johnston explicitly refers to men as ‘biological aggressors’ (Johnston, 1973: p. 165).

1
2 I contend that these criticisms from feminist theorists are fully relevant: they successfully expose
3 the shortcomings of misandry when defined as a political project by feminist activists and theorists.
4 By political project, I mean a predetermined set of goals, values or practices, used as the premises
5 or the 'foundations' of political action (Butler, 1995; Elam, 1994: p. 108). However, I argue that 6 these discussions often miss an important point. First, references to hatred are rare and usually 7 poorly detailed; when addressed, misandry is at best briefly dealt with in a few lines. These few 8 discussions are not enough to fully account for the emotional negativity that runs through the 9 positions taken by some feminists, such as Coffin or Harmange, or Solanas and her French
10 followers during the women's movements of the 1970s, which I will address below. Hate is 11 embarrassing to the point that feminists seem unwilling to theoretically engage with it. In this 12 regard, feminist affect studies would benefit from taking the same negative turn as queer studies
13 (Halberstam, 2011). I suggest that 'dirty' (Ngai, 2005) or anti-relational (Bersani, 1987) feelings
14 that challenge humanist conceptions of subjectivity and politics (Edelman, 2004) are worth being 15 looked at thoroughly.

21 Second, it is crucial to reflect on this issue if we are to exhibit a number of structurally silenced
22 narratives within French feminism. Ilana Eloit shows just how central accusations of misandry are 23 to heteronormative French feminist rhetoric against lesbians: charged with destroying 'a natural 24 harmony between men and women' (Eloit, 2019: p. 382), she contends their dissident voices have 25 been erased from mainstream French feminist historiography. Reflecting on misandry in feminist 26 discourse I also aim at deactivating heteronormative feminist narratives: misandry is part of 27 feminist emotional past and present and not the exclusive prerogative of the abject figure of the 28 'hysterical dyke' (p. 384).

32 Finally, anti-essentialist critics of man-hating generally do not engage with the first kind of 33 criticism I described above: the rejection of misandry as an anti-feminist stereotype. Yet in this
34 article I will show that in a seemingly paradoxical way the anti-feminist allegations of misandry
35 provide precious insights into some feminists' reclaiming of man-hating. I defend that misandry
36 does not necessarily entail an essentialist political project aimed at establishing an idealized
37 community of women that erases power relations between women as well as gender normativity
38 from feminist narratives and representations. If language – in the broad sense of a set of meanings –
39 is to be defined as a power device, which structurally prevents marginalized subjects from speaking
40 out and voicing their demands, feminist misandry can then be read as a contextual and sometimes 41 enabling discursive strategy.

48 II. Stigma reversal: can misandry become a feminist discursive strategy?

49 Let's start again from this simple statement: anti-feminists routinely stereotype feminists as man-
50 haters. This stereotype amounts to a stigma, more specifically a discursive device that structurally
51 renders the voices of feminists inaudible. Drawing from Judith Butler's works on injurious
52 speeches, I will discuss the strategy of stigma reversal and suggest that some feminists may have 53 claimed misandry in order to take back the discursive agency they have been deprived of and 54 negotiate with a set of meanings that tends to reduce them to silence and shame.

59 Following sociologist Erving Goffman's definition, I suggest to define misandry as a stigma:
60 something that causes, within a given social interaction, the discrediting of an individual's social

1
2 identity; the social repartition of credit and discredit drawing the boundary between individuals
3 considered normal and those deemed deviant. Among the different types of stigma defined by 4 Goffman are thus 'domineering or unnatural passions', these being inferred from 'homosexuality
5 and radical political behaviour' (Goffman, 1986: p. 13). Similarly, feminism is seen as the cause or 6 the manifestation of deviant or 'unnatural' affects of hatred some women are believed to feel and 7 that result in producing them as abnormal. Social processes of stigmatization also systematically 8 raise strategic issues of 'stigma management': stigmatized individuals have to negotiate their 9 assigned social identity so as to lessen 'the discrepancy between virtual and actual social identity'
10 (Goffman, 1986: pp. 11–12), that is, the gap between one's individual sense of self and the way 11 social frames of perception portray them.
12
13
14

15
16 I contend that following this definition, speeches about 'man-hating' attach a stigma to specific
17 groups of women. This is, for example, the case of lesbians whose supposed hatred of men is a 18 stereotype routinely involved in legitimizing lesbophobic violence and discrimination. Historically, 19 this lesbophobic stigma is closely associated with anti-feminist rhetoric, the epithet 'lesbian' being 20 itself used as a stigma directed against feminists. Feminists are accused of being lesbians and thus,
21 implicitly, man-haters in order to cast discredit on their struggles and their claims. In other words, 22 this is a case of transitive stigmatization: feminists are discredited in mainstream narratives because 23 of their association, within those very narratives, with a group perceived as deviant. Thus, in the 24 case of French feminist movements of the 1970s, it was not uncommon for feminists to participate
25 more or less openly in the stigmatization of lesbians, in order to negotiate their own inclusion in the 26 category of people who are socially constructed as normal (Eloit, 2018). Secondly, the anti-feminist 27 'feminists-hate-men' discourse can also arise regardless of references to lesbianism, and is then 28 founded upon representations that associate feminism with a range of 'passions' that are deemed 29 'unnatural' when experienced by women (frustration, hysteria, violence, etc.).
30
31
32
33
34
35
36

37 Following Judith Butler, I suggest this stigma works as a discursive device which conveys and 38 enforces norms, whose effect is to establish specific bodies as object – as non-subjects (Butler, 39 1995: p. 46). Misandry, the 'unnatural passion' that afflicts feminists in anti-feminist 40 representations, is instrumental in building bodies and voices that do not 'count' (Butler, 1993)
41 (deviant women, lesbians, etc.). In other words, the case of feminist misandry must be considered as 42 part of a larger discussion about the possibilities of voicing a critical stance within a social space of 43 meanings which is primarily shaped by dominant groups' representations and interests (Lorde, 44 1984a). How do feminists manage the stigmatizing effects of an affect – hatred of men? How do 45 they negotiate their own agency regarding the negative frames through which they tend to be 46 perceived? What strategies can feminists use in order to act against the degrading effects of the 47 stigma? For feminists, then, misandry raises first and foremost a strategic and discursive issue: what 48 can one do with words?
49
50
51
52

53 In Excitable speech, Butler focuses explicitly on such verbal strategies, language and subjectivity
54 being inescapably shaped by those injurious words and their performative effects. She contends that 55 the power of such words is by no means unequivocal: the injury 'may appear to fix or paralyze the 56 one it hails, but it may also produce an unexpected and enabling response' (Butler, 1997: p. 2).
57 Some practices are likely to resignify the insult insofar as to contextually reverse its effects. In 58 'Critically Queer' she examines this possibility via the practice of stigma reversal, when the injured
59 subject incorporates this very same stigma into their own self-discourse and turns it into a positive 60

1
2 component of their social and political identity. In the process '[a] term that signalled degradation
3 [is] turned (...) to signify a new and affirmative set of meanings' (Butler, 1999a: p. 570). Drawing
4 on Butler's analysis, I contend that many feminist uses of misandry are practices of stigma reversal.
5 When feminists call themselves 'man-haters' they resignify the injurious term in order to undermine 6 the way the word was supposed to work in the first place – namely, as a 'paralyzing slur' (p. 570).
7
8
9

10 11 III. Valerie Solanas in Paris: an 'unfamiliar scum'<sup>5</sup>

12 To further this hypothesis, I hereby focus on a historical case study: the appropriation of Valerie
13 Solanas' SCUM Manifesto by French feminists of the second wave. After a brief historical review
14 of the role of misandry within French women's movements of the 1970s, I will turn to the reception
15 of SCUM by French radical feminists. Such discourses, I will show, are both prominently 16 metaphorical and empowering in their effects; as such they exhibit features that are characteristic of 17 strategies of stigma-reversal.
18
19

20
21 In France, second-wave feminist movements' earliest premises can be dated back to May 1968.
22 Historians usually agree in considering that the founding event of the movement was a parody
23 ceremony under the Arc de Triomphe in Paris, in August 1970, and define as its end 1979, a year of 24 great tensions within the movement (Picq, 2011). In her reference book on misandry within the 25 French Women's Liberation Movement (or MLF, for Mouvement de Libération des Femmes), 26 historian Colette Pipon observes that the word 'misandry' appeared for the first time in several 27 dictionaries during the 1970s (2014: p. 16), as if the rise of a feminist movement in turn produced
28 stigmatizing terms designed to silence it. There were indeed many denials of the stereotype of 29 feminists as man-haters in the feminist press of the period. For example, in La voix des femmes
30 (Women's voice), one of the first newspapers of the women's movement in Lyon, some of the 31 contributors seemed anxious to justify that their political choice to organize exclusively among 32 women is not based on a rejection of men:<sup>6</sup> 'it should not be believed that the women of the MLF
33 are against males,' they stated (Jacquemart and Masclet, 2017: p. 224).
34
35
36
37

38 However, Pipon also made it very clear that, although adopted by a minority, man-hating discourse
39 was a component of MLF activists' rhetoric, largely among the trend closely identified with radical
40 feminism.<sup>7</sup> Like US radical feminist Pamela Kearon (1970: p. 84), some explicitly advocated for an 41 affirmative use of the word 'misandry,' such as an anonymous contributor to the feminist journal Le 42 Torchon Brûle in 1971:<sup>8</sup>
43
44

45
46       Anyway, guys are misogynists, okay; but I, since I was born, I've been, uh, the same as 47 misogynist; the equivalent. (...) With friends we started looking everywhere, in the 48 dictionary, the big one, the small one, everywhere in the literature, nothing. In other 49 words, in this world made and built for them, men have the right to dislike women.
50
51

52
53 5 A translation of the title of Cathy Bernheim's text I quote below. See Bernheim (2009 [1971]).

54 6 A concern that is largely understandable when one considers the hostility they had to face from their male activist
55 counterparts in leftist organizations. For an example of this leftist male hostility, see the humorous text written by a
56 group of feminist activists 'Contre le terrorisme mâle' ('Against male terrorism'), initially published in L'idiot
57 international, n°7-8, July-August 1970, reproduced in Kandel (1992: pp. 246–248).

58 7 The Parisian second-wave feminist trend called 'revolutionary feminist,' which included some of the most influential 59 leaders of the movement, endorsed political positions that strongly resembled radical feminism. See Picq (2011).

60 8 Le torchon brûle is one of the main journals of the MLF, issued from 1970 to 1973. Contributors are always anonymous.

1
2 Women, of course, have no right to take a dislike to them (...). It is up to us to invent
3 this word (...).
4

5
6 Instead of denying that they hate men, some second-wave feminists did actively claim it. However,
7 Pipon defends that such hatred of men is fundamentally different from misogyny. First, misogyny is 8 a violent affect aimed at one's destruction, submission or oppression; yet 'as a matter of fact, the 9 protagonists of the Movement made no attempt to destroy or oppress men' (Pipon, 2014: p. 204).
10 Indeed, these movements were predominantly non-violent in nature. Feminists willingly claim their 11 refusal of physical violence (Zancarini-Fournel, 2005), and some of the same feminists who 12 advocate misandry had made non-violence a decisive argument in favour of their struggle: there
13 were no 'castrated, mutilated or stoned males in the name of the victims of sexism' (Bernheim et 14 al., 2009: p. 7). In a word, feminist misandry cannot be associated with a definition of hatred that 15 we may call destructive: a desire to actually harm, destroy or submit men.
16
17
18

19
20 In this respect, this affect in no way matches the affective drive I described above earlier using 21 Ahmed, Lorde and Le Cour Grandmaison: feminist misandry exhibits characteristics that tend to 22 profoundly alter the meaning of the hatred such speeches are supposed to carry. Secondly, Pipon
23 argues that hatred of men as expressed by 1970s feminists is what she calls a 'response-hatred:' a 24 defensive reaction towards misogyny (Pipon, 2014: p. 204). According to her, misandry is 25 contextual and understandable only as a discursive strategy aimed against a primary affect – hatred
26 and contempt for women in patriarchal societies. While I agree with her analysis of misandry as a
27 contextual strategy, I argue that the target of such strategy is not so much misogyny but the anti-28 feminist stigma of feminists as man-haters. Feminists call themselves 'man-haters' (misandres) in 29 order to counter the stigma and neutralize its restraining and inhibiting effects on their actions and 30 speeches. Thus, I disagree with Pipon, who argues that second-wave feminists' misandry led the 31 movement to a 'dead-end' (p. 175). In her view, aggressive practices and discourse among some 32 MLF activists have discouraged later generations of activists from identifying as feminists (p. 203), 33 and she goes so far as to imply that for this reason radical lesbianism prompted the demise of the 34 movement (Eloit, 2018: p. 263). On the contrary, I argue that the inhibiting effects of such a stigma 35 on feminist politics – the aggressive, castrating and hateful feminist you should at all cost avoid to 36 become – can be managed, if not neutralized, by means of feminist misandry.
37
38
39
40
41
42
43

44
45 My analysis is based on my reading of the French appropriations of Valerie Solanas' SCUM
46 Manifesto, which in spite being extremely marginal in the French context is emblematic the internal 47 misandry of second-wave feminist movements, or misandry claimed by feminist activists. This text
48 reached sudden notoriety after Solanas shot Andy Warhol in 1968, becoming overnight 'something
49 of a cause celebre among radical feminists' in the United States<sup>9</sup> and bringing controversies within 50 women's liberation groups in the US (Echols, 1989: p. 105). With a sharp humour and an especially 51 imaginative verbal violence, she depicts men as despicable, repugnant, and biologically inferior
52 beings (Solanas, 2004 [1977]). In France, Solanas' deeds were far from making headlines as they 53 did in the United States. The SCUM Manifesto, however, did come across the Atlantic, which is not 54 surprising considering that the writings of the women's movement in the United States were widely 55
56
57
58

59
60 <sup>9</sup> Influential feminist activists Ti-Grace Atkinson and Florynce Kennedy described her as 'the first outstanding champion of women's rights' and 'one of the most important spokeswomen of the feminist movement' (Fahs, 2008, p.
596).

1
2 read within the nascent French MLF in 1970.<sup>10</sup> Translated by a feminist activist, Emmanuèle de
3 Lesseps, with a front cover that described SCUM as ‘the first manifesto for women’s liberation’
4 (Solanas and Rochefort, 1971), the manifesto quickly began to capture French feminists’
5 imagination as well. Such is the success of the manifesto that it quickly ran out of print, and many 6 feminists complained that they couldn’t get a copy: filmmaker Carole Roussopoulos and actress
7 Delphine Seyrig then came up with an ingenious way to share its content, shooting a short film with 8 an out loud reading of the manifesto (Roussopoulos and Seyrig, 1976; Fleckinger, 2009).

9
10
11 Of course, because Valerie Solanas has never been part of the feminist movement and because of 12 the biting irony of her writing these feminist appropriations are always limited: her manifesto can 13 just as easily be appropriated by anti-feminists as by feminists.<sup>11</sup> Some may find there the echo of 14 their own anti-feminist fantasies and a satisfying confirmation of what they project upon feminist
15 movements: a political project directed towards the oppression of men by women.<sup>12</sup> Butler stresses
16 it is never certain that the strategy of stigma reversal will work and ‘the term [can] overcome its 17 constitutive history of injury’. ‘Neither power nor discourse are rendered anew at every moment’
18 she recalls; ‘they are not as weightless as the utopics of radical resignification might imply’ (Butler, 19 1999a: pp. 570–571). Using the concept of strategy, I thereby emphasize that the effects of 20 misandry are always contextual, in order to avoid unilateral and essentializing interpretations.

21
22
23
24
25
26
27 Nevertheless, Valerie Solanas’ manifesto had a deep and significant impact on some of the French
28 women’s movement activists in the 1970s. Those who read and disseminated the text were 29 especially challenged, inspired and influenced by two specific dimensions: the fantasy of a world
30 without men and a political imagery of unabashed violence. These privileged topics reflect two 31 important characteristics of misandry when claimed by these feminists: a prominently metaphorical 32 or symbolic dimension, and empowering effects.

33
34
35
36 First, some see Solanas’ text as a vehicle for conveying and exploring specific fantasies, fictitious 37 representations that are not intended to come true (as they are not actual political projects) but rather 38 to foster the political imagery of the movement. Feminist and lesbian activist Cathy Bernheim<sup>13</sup>
39 thus wrote a text about SCUM in which she mentioned a ‘collective fantasy:’ the cathartic fiction of 40 the outright demise of men. ‘When they will read SCUM, men [...] will ask us, without believing it:
41 is it true that you want a world where we would not exist? We will answer them, women, my 42 sisters, that we do not desire such a world: we are plotting it’ (Bernheim, 2009 [1971]: pp. 257–
43 258). In spite of the determination she expresses, the world without men she refers to is purely a 44 fantasy: as Pipon puts it ‘while the discourse is sometimes provocative, even aggressive towards 45
46
47
48

49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60
10 One of the first sets of texts written in France by second-wave feminists about the movement, an issue of leftist review Partisans, bears witness of this influence (Libération des femmes, année zéro, n° 54-55, 1970). About the third of the articles displayed in this issue are translations of writings by US feminists such as Roxanne Dunbar, Carol Hanisch, Anne Koedt, etc.

11 As an illustration of the ambiguous ways Solanas’ text captures the imagination, the foreword of the 1998 French edition of the manifesto was written by Michel Houellebecq, a prominent writer well known for his anti-feminism.

12 For example, such is the case of French writer Robert Merle, who authored in 1974 a science fiction novel depicting a tyrannical matriarchy in which women deprive men of their freedom, sexually and economically exploiting them (Merle, 1974). The author takes the feminist movements of the early 1970s as a source of inspiration, having read
SCUM with great interest (Wattel, 2018: p. 94; pp. 247–248).

13 An early activist within the MLF and one of the founders in 1971 of the Gouines rouges (Red dykes), a lesbian feminist group, she is the author of a book that recounts her memories of the movement (Bernheim, 1983).

men, (...) the radicality is contained within the realm of feminist thought and words and violence is limited to the field of imagination' (Pipon, 2014: p. 205). Historian Michelle Zancarini-Fournel also highlights the 'symbolic' character of the violence perpetrated by feminist activists in the 1970s: 'Women's weapons are provocation, derision,' they belong to the domain of words and spectacle (Zancarini-Fournel, 2005). In a word, the negative and violent affect such appropriations of Solanas exhibit aims at something which is not so much material as symbolic. Taking up the way the subtitle of the SCUM was originally translated in many languages,<sup>14</sup> the French followers of Solanas do not so much advocate for the actual annihilation of men as they call for a fictional representation they consider to have liberating effects. Quoting the vocabulary used by Liliane Kandel, a feminist activist of the 1970s, I suggest that feminist misandry can thus be read as a 'metaphor',<sup>15</sup> i.e. as a figure of speech (Kandel, 1992). Much like a stylistic device indeed, misandry is not to be interpreted literally; the point is rather to question the desired effect of the verbal image.

The metaphorical dimension of feminist misandry has empowering effects for feminists, in particular through the discursive appropriation of unabashed and cathartic violence. Feminists such as Christiane Rochefort, a famous novelist and early member of the MLF, draw upon the imagery of physical violence that infuses the manifesto in order to symbolically reclaim an agency that patriarchal oppression deprives women of. 'There comes a time when you need to pull the knives,' she writes in the powerful foreword to the 1971 French edition of the manifesto. To her, violence is necessary because within mainstream social frames of perception the victimhood of women is merely viewed as a 'natural fact' and not as a social prejudice that needs to be addressed. Claiming victim status and acting as such is then tantamount to 'blending into the background set by the oppressor'. As a result, 'the knife is the only way to define oneself as oppressed': violence is the only language likely to voice oppression in a way the oppressor can hear and pay attention to (Rochefort, 2005 [1971]: p. 3). In a word, misandry is the one and only kind of political speech women have which may not be a priori made helpless, silent and ineffective. SCUM is perceived by feminists like Rochefort as an unordinary and inspiring text charged with an agency women's voices are usually robbed of.

How can metaphorical hatred be empowering for feminists and in which place does fictional violence become agency? I argue that the use of misandry as a discursive strategy of stigma reversal is the very reason of such connection. As Avital Ronell puts it, what feminists owe to Solanas is having 'plug[ged] the kind of speech that counters while resembling hate speech' (Ronell, 2004). The SCUM Manifesto served as an opportunity to express a je ne sais quoi they were both struggling and eager to voice: to provocatively reverse the negative image their detractors reflected back to them. Cathy Bernheim acknowledges such a debt when she fiercely claims: 'Yes, we are what you say we are, we are even worse'<sup>16</sup> (Bernheim, 2009[1971]: p. 259).

14 Dana Heller defends that the meaning of the acronym, Society for Cutting Up Men, was originally a mere literary device (Heller, 2001). In the foreword she writes to the 2004 edition of SCUM, Avital Ronell traces how throughout the translation process in various languages – German (1969), Spanish (1977), Italian (1994) and Czech (1998) – the subtitle has been "gloss[ed] on [...] with annihilating precision" (Ronell, 2004).

15 A phrase she initially uses in reference to non-mixed practices within the MLF.

16 In much the same way, in 1970, Robin Morgan (a prominent US second-wave radical feminist) angrily writes that 'we are the women that men have warned us about' (Morgan, 1971: p. 275).

IV. Countering respectability politics: hatred, anger and power

What's empowering about a stigma-reversal strategy such as misandry? Drawing on these French appropriations of Solanas, I hereby open up a few theoretical inquiries for reflecting on what this strategy enables feminists to overcome and what kind of possibilities it brings into existence.

First, I contend that the strategic use of misandry can help break with the overly restrictive constraints of the politics of respectability and their paralyzing effects on the movement. The concept of 'respectability' is used by sociologist Beverley Skeggs in her work on white working-class women in the United Kingdom (Skeggs, 1997). She shows that in this context, femininity works as a display consciously performed by women in order to counter class stigmatization. When used regarding social struggles, the concept of 'respectability politics' refers to a strategy that consists in an emphasis on appearances and reputation, thus attempting to deactivate the negative representations attached to a minority in struggle in order to get their demands heard (Higginbotham, 1993). However, this strategy has serious negative consequences for such groups. Dealing with the case of Black activism, E. Frances White thus shows that such politics gives rise to dangerous forms of gatekeeping and the silencing of difference (White, 2001). Works on LGBTQI activism have also brought to light the effects of this strategy on gender and sexual minorities (Matsick and Conley, 2015) and the ways they tend to reinforce typical oppressive feelings such as shame or fear (Robinson, 2012). Applied to feminism, respectability politics is a collective endeavour to meet the norms of femininity or 'good' womanhood in order to make claims about equality heard and accepted.

Claiming misandry, on the contrary, can be read as a discursive strategy directed against injunctions to respectability. For example, in this way one can interpret the fascination Valerie Solanas' eccentric manifesto produced on second-wave feminists. In their eyes, Valerie Solanas embodies a provocative and conscious refusal to answer anti-feminist man-hating-baiting with a defensive stance of denial: 'She laughs in the face of apologetic, we-don't-really-hate-men, we're-not-lesbians, we-shave-our armpits, we're-not offensive feminism. She arouses the central anxieties of the feminist movement [...]' (Fahs, 2008: p. 613). Thus, 50 years after French feminists first discovered Solanas' SCUM Manifesto, Pauline Harmange confirms that she finds misandry liberating and even exhilarating: 'I see misandry as a way out. A way to exist outside the box, a way to say no with each breath. Hating men as a social group and in many cases as individuals as well brings me great joy – not only because I'm a crazy old cat lady' (Harmange, 2020: p. 14).

Moreover, feminist respectability politics have especially damaging effects on the expression of anger. Being angry is indeed radically incompatible with standards of femininity, and thus concerns for appearances and respectability unavoidably take part in policing feminist expressions of negative and oppositional feelings. For example, French author and blogger Valérie Rey-Robert points out that the discourse of female rape survivors about their own experience is strongly impacted by the negative stigmatization of anger; they feel compelled to 'avoid any aggressive or misandre (man-hating) remarks that, as we know, could scare [men] away' (Rey-Robert, 2020). Alice Coffin thus claims the heritage of Solanas when she clarifies the criticism she makes of the 'not-all-men' rhetoric.

I don't know what extra amount of men would be necessary to stop condemning 'men' and start to write 'certain men,' 'some men,' 'a few men,' but I know we are talking about teratons, not grams. This injunction not to generalize locks up public speaking out but not private conversations between feminists. Let them know that [the conversations]

1
2 I hear on a daily basis are variations on Valerie Solanas' words in the SCUM Manifesto:
3 'The male has a negative Midas Touch – everything he touches turns to shit.' So I'm
4 going to generalize. It's not as if men feel bad about doing exactly the same thing [...].
5 Yes, then, I'll say 'men'. (Coffin, 2020: 196)
6

7
8 What I suggest here is that in opposing respectability politics, misandry as a discursive strategy and 9 a metaphoric and symbolic hatred of men opens up new possibilities for the feminist voicing of 10 anger. In a word, maybe hatred should not systematically be opposed to anger, if anger is to be 11 considered as a valuable political resource for feminism (Ahmed, 2013; Lorde, 1984b). Provocative
12 expressions of hate are sometimes one of the 'conditions of possibility for feminist anger to get a 13 just hearing' (Ahmed, 2013: p. 177).
14
15
16
17

18 Conclusion

19 When it comes to feminists, hatred is primarily a stigma, and this is precisely the reason why
20 claiming such a violent affect can, on occasion, become a way to reclaim agency. Therein lies a 21 paradox: because feminists tend to be silenced by accusations of hating men, symbolic 22 manifestations of misandry can perhaps be useful to feminists. Without denying the multiple 23 political dead-ends hatred of men can push feminism into, it therefore seems important to suggest 24 that feminist misandry can also, in a very contextual way, become empowering for feminists as a
25 strategy of stigma reversal. The outcome of the strategy is such that this hatred, transformed into a
26 figure of speech that no longer has much to do with the original urge to destroy, opens up 27 possibilities to reject the rules of mainstream discourse and the injunctions of respectability politics.
28
29
30
31
32
33

34 References

- 35 Ahmed S (2013) Feminist Attachments: The Cultural Politics of Emotion. New York: Routledge.
36 Anonymous (1971) Dans les HLM. Le torchon brûle 2: 10.
37 Bard C (1999) Un siècle d'antiféminisme. Fayard, Paris.
38 Bernheim C (2009[1971]) SCUM ou l'écume inconnue. In: Bernheim C, Kandel L, Picq F et al.
39 (eds) Mouvement de libération des femmes: textes premiers. Paris: Stock, pp. 255–261.
40 Bernheim C (1983) Perturbation, ma sœur: naissance d'un mouvement de femmes (1970-1972), 41 Paris: Seuil.
42 Bernheim C, Kandel L, Picq F et al. (eds) (2009) Mouvement de libération des femmes: textes
43 premiers.
44 Bersani, Leo. 1987. Is the Rectum a Grave? October 43.
45 Butler J (1993) Bodies that Matter: on the Discursive Limits of "Sex." New York: Routledge.
46 Butler J (1995) Contingent Foundations: Feminism and the Question of "Postmodernism." In:
47 Butler J and Scott J (eds) Feminist Contentions: A Philosophical Exchange, Thinking
48 Gender. New York: Routledge.
49 Butler J (1997) Excitable speech: a politics of the performative. New York: Routledge.
50 Butler J (1999a) Critically Queer. In: Wolfreys J (ed) Literary Theories: A Reader and Guide.
51 Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, pp. 570–586.
52 Butler J (1999b) Gender trouble: feminism and the subversion of identity. New York: Routledge.
53 Cappelle L (2021) With 'I Hate Men,' a French Feminist Touches a Nerve. The New York Times, 54 January 10th 2021, sect. Books (accessed 17 February 21).
55 Clément N et al. (2020) Au bal des harpies. Valeurs Actuelles, 12 March, 26.
56
57
58
59
60

- 1
2 Coffin Alice (2020) Le génie lesbien. Paris, France: Grasset.
- 3 Collectif (2018) Nous défendons une liberté d'importuner, indispensable à la liberté sexuelle. Le
4 Monde, 9 January.
- 5
6 Douglas S (1995) Where the Girls Are: Growing Up Female With the Mass Media. New York:
7 Times Books.
- 8 Dupuis-Déri F (2012) Le discours de la « crise de la masculinité » comme refus de l'égalité entre les 9 sexes: histoire d'une rhétorique antiféministe. Cahiers du Genre 52(1): 119–143.
- 10 Dupuis-Déri F and Blais M (eds) (2015) Le Mouvement masculiniste au Québec: l'antiféminisme
11 démasqué. Montréal: Les Éditions du remue-ménage.
- 12
13 Echols A (1989) Daring to be bad: radical feminism in America 1967-1975. Minneapolis, London:
14 University of Minnesota Press.
- 15
16 Edelman L (2004) No future: queer theory and the death drive. Electronic resource. e-Duke Books
17 Archive, Series Q.
- 18
19 Elam D (1994) Feminism and deconstruction: Ms. en abyme. London, New York: Routledge.
- 20 Eloit I (2018) Lesbian Trouble: Feminism, Heterosexuality and the French Nation (1970-1981).
21 PhD Thesis, LSE - London School of Economics and Political Science, UK.
- 22
23 Eloit I (2019) American Lesbians Are Not French Women: Heterosexual French Feminism and the 24 Americanisation of Lesbianism in the 1970s. Feminist Theory 20(4): 381-404.
- 25
26 Fahs B (2008) The Radical Possibilities of Valerie Solanas. Feminist Studies 34(3): 591–617.
- 27 Fleckinger H (2009) Une révolution du regard. Entretien avec Carole Roussopoulos, réalisatrice 28 féministe. Nouvelles Questions Feministes 28(1): 98-118.
- 29
30 Goffman E (1986) Stigma: notes on the management of spoiled identity. New York: Simon &
31 Schuster.
- 32
33 Halberstam J (2011) The queer art of failure. Durham: Duke University Press.
- 34 Harmange P (2020) Moi les hommes, je les déteste. Paris, France: Éditions du Seuil.
- 35 Harmange P and Lehrer N (2020) I Hate Men. London: Fourth Estate Ltd.
- 36 Hekman S (2000) Beyond identity: Feminism, identity and identity politics. Feminist Theory 1(3): 37 289–308.
- 38
39 Heller D (2001) Shooting Solanas: Radical Feminist History and the Technology of Failure.
40 Feminist Studies 27(1): 167.
- 41 Higginbotham EB (1993) Righteous discontent: The women's movement in the Black Baptist 42 Church, 1880-1920. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- 43
44 Holmes M (2004) Feeling Beyond Rules: Politicizing the Sociology of Emotion and Anger in 45 Feminist Politics. European Journal of Social Theory 7(2): 209–227.
- 46
47 hooks b (1984) Men: Comrades in Struggle. In: Feminist Theory from Margin to Center. Boston:
48 South End Press, pp. 68–83.
- 49
50 Jacquemart A (2015) Les hommes dans les mouvements féministes: socio-histoire d'un engagement
51 improbable. Rennes: Presses universitaires de Rennes.
- 52
53 Jacquemart A and Masclet C (2017) Mixités et non-mixités dans les mouvements féministes des 54 années 1968 en France. Clio 46(2): 221–247.
- 55
56 Johnston J (1973) Lesbian nation: The feminist solution. New York: Simon and Schuster.
- 57
58 Kandel L (1992) La non-mixité comme métaphore. In: Baudoux C and Zaidman C (eds) Égalité
59 entre les sexes: mixité et démocratie. Paris: L'Harmattan.
- 60
61 Kearon P (1970) Man-Hating. In: Koedt A and Firestone S (eds) Notes from the Second Year: Women's Liberation. New York: Radical Feminism.
- 62
63 Le Cour Grandmaison O (2002) Haine(s). Presses Universitaires de France.

- 1
2 Lorde A (1984a) The Master's Tools Will Never Dismantle the Master's House. In: Sister Outsider: Essays and Speeches. Trumansburg: Crossing Press, pp. 110–114.
- 3
4 Lorde A (1984b) The Uses of Anger: Women Responding to Racism. In: Sister Outsider: Essays and Speeches. Trumansburg: Crossing Press, pp. 125–133.
- 5
6 Matsick JL, Conley TD (2015) Maybe “I Do,” Maybe I Don't: Respectability Politics in the Same-Sex Marriage Ruling. Analyses of Social Issues and Public Policy 15(1), 409–413.
- 7
8
9 Merle R (1974) Les hommes protégés. Paris: Gallimard.
- 10
11 Morgan R (1971) Goodbye to All That. In: Tanner L (ed) Voices from women's liberation. New York: New American library.
- 12
13
14 Ngai S (2005) Ugly Feelings. Cambridge: Harvard University Press.
- 15
16 Phelan S (1989) Identity politics: lesbian feminism and the limits of community. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.
- 17
18 Picq F (2011) Libération des femmes: quarante ans de mouvement. Brest: Dialogues.
- 19
20 Pipon C (2014) Et on tuera tous les affreux: le féminisme au risque de la misandrie, 1970-1980. Rennes: Presses universitaires de Rennes.
- 21
22 Rey-Robert V (2020) Des femmes violées et de leur indignité. In: Crêpe Georgette. Available at <http://www.crepegeorgette.com/2020/02/06/femmes-violees-indignite/> (accessed 18 May 20).
- 23
24
25
26 Robinson BA (2012) Is This What Equality Looks Like?: How Assimilation Marginalizes the Dutch LGBT Community. Sex Res Soc Policy 9(4), 327–336.
- 27
28 Rochefort C (2005[1971]) Définition de l'opprimé. In: Solanas V, Lesseps E (trad) SCUM Manifesto. Paris: Zanzara athée. Available at https://www.infokiosques.net/IMG/pdf/SCUM\_v2005-pageparpage.pdf (accessed 29 March 21).
- 29
30
31
32
33 Ronell A (2004) Deviant Paybacks: the Aims of Valerie Solanas. In: SCUM Manifesto [epub]. New York: Verso.
- 34
35
36 Roussopoulos C and Seyrig D (1976) S.C.U.M. Manifesto.
- 37
38 Skeggs B (1997) Formations of class and gender: becoming respectable. Thousand Oaks: SAGE.
- 39
40 Solanas V (2004[1977]) SCUM manifesto [epub]. New York: Verso.
- 41
42 Solanas V and Rochefort C (1971) SCUM. de Lesseps E (tran). Paris, France: La nouvelle société.
- 43
44 Spelman E (1996) Anger and Insubordination. In: Garry A and Pearsall M (ed) Women, Knowledge and Reality: Explorations in Feminist Philosophy. New York: Routledge.
- 45
46 Wattel A (2018) Robert Merle, écrivain singulier du propre de l'homme. Presses Universitaires du Septentrion.
- 47
48 White EF (2001) Dark continent of our bodies: Black feminism and the politics of respectability. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.
- 49
50 Zancarini-Fournel M (2005) Stratégies de distinction par la voix et le geste: provocations et violences symboliques des femmes dans les manifestations des années 68. In: Bourdin P, Bernard M and Caron JC (eds) La voix & le geste: une approche culturelle de la violence socio-politique. Clermont-Ferrand: Presses universitaires Blaise-Pascal.
- 51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60